GESANG DER PARZEN

(SONG OF THE FATES)

From the "IPHIGENIE" of Goethe

FOR CHOIR AND ORCHESTRA.

Kindly presented to the Liedertafel
by John Gray, Esq.

Johannes Brahms,

In fear of the Gods shall ye dwell, sons of men !
S. le empire they hold in their hands everlasting
And wield at their pleasure the lightnings of fate.

He doubly shall tremble whom they have exalted !
On turrets of cloudland enthroned they banquet,
Pour golden libations.

But are they offended, they hurl forth the guest,
To dishonour and ruin, where shadows are deepest.
There vainly he waiteth, in darkness and bondage,
For justice and judgment.

But they hold, th' Immortals, eternal carousals,
Pour golden libations.
They stride over height unto height thro' the heavens ,

Johannes Brahms.

In fear of the Gods shall ye dwell, sons of men !
Sle empire they hold in their hands everlasting
And wield at their pleasure the lightnings of fate.

He doubly shall tremble whom they have exalted !
On turrets of cloudland enthroned they banquet,

There vainly he waiteth, in darkness and bondage,
For justice and judgment.

But they hold, th' Immortals, eternal carousals,
Pour golden libations.
They stride over height unto height thro' the heavens,
From earthy abysses arises the groaning
Of long smother'd Titans,
A fragrant oblation, faint cloud on the azure.

The all-ruling Gods shut the gates of their blessings
On whole generations,
Avoiding the once cherish'd, still speaking features
Of Grandsire in far distant and blameless sons.

Thus chanted the Sisters ; below, 'mong the Shadows
The Exil'd one hearken'd the Fates' dread foreboding
He thinks on his children, all darkness and doubt.

THE BIRTH OF HERCULES,

FROM THE LYRIC DRAMA

ARISTODEMUS.

G. W. L. Marshall-Hall.

THE LIEDERTAFEL

AND ORCHESTRA.

THE lineal descendants of Hercules, the Messenians, have, by pestilence and their foes, been driven to their last stronghold, the citadel of Ithôme. There they await the oracle of the god, which shall determine their fate, and in worship to Zeus recall the ancient splendid legend of the birth of their ancestor Hercules, and of the wrath of Hêrê (Juno), to whom they ascribe all their misfortunes. They implore Zeus to remember his erewhile love towards his offspring, and to avert from them "the wrath and the doom." The music is an attempt to realize something of the dignity and splendour with which the Greeks surrounded their gods, in whom they embodied the most vital characteristics of their race. There is nothing in the wonderful symbolism of their mythology more inspired than the conception that their Heroes were the offspring of the intercourse of gods with mortal beings. Thus alone did it seem to them, could the pre-eminence of certain of the greatest among men be accounted for.
