Cantata—Columbus

Liedertafel

(WITH ORCHESTRAL ACCOMPANIMENT)

Solos by

Mr. Armes Beaumont and Mr. Horace Stevens

(Music kindly lent by the Sydney Liedertafel)

CARL JOSEPH BRAMBACH, the Composer of this Cantata, was born July 4, 1833, at Bonn, on the Rhine. From 1851 to 1854 he attended the Cologne music school, at the close of which period he was granted a fellowship in the Mozart-Stiftung at Frankfort on the Main, being one of the four on whom the honour was conferred. He then took private lessons with Ferdinand Hiller, and in 1859 was appointed a professor in the Rhenish music school at Cologne, where he had formerly been a pupil. Here he remained till 1861, in which year he received a call from his native city to become musical director there. This position was held by him one year. Since 1869 he has resided in his native city, devoting himself to teaching music and to composition. His more extensive choral works include: Consolation in Music, The Eleusinian Festival, Hymn to Spring, The Power of Song, Velleda, Alcestis, Prometheus, and German Song of Victory. Besides these works he has written compositions for the piano, sonatas, chamber music, and several good songs. One of the latter, "Morning in the Forest," has been given by the Metropolitan Liedertafel at previous concerts. The cantata of Columbus gained the prize of 1000 dollars offered in 1885 by the North American Sängerbund for an original composition for male chorus, solos and orchestra, the competition being made international, and the successful work was performed at Milwaukee, at the 24th Festival of the organisation named, on 23rd July, 1886.

The text of the work is by Wilhelm von Warmbrunhl. It has for its theme the first voyage of Columbus to America. The mutiny, which is generally stated to have broken out among the crew, is not introduced in this work, which expresses instead the misgiving and terror of the sailors, in strong contrast with the faith and courage of the great captain.

After a short characteristic prelude the work begins with the departure of Columbus and his associates from the Andalusian port, Palos, and the chorus sings:—

On board! On board!
 From land away!
 'Mid billows whirling,
 Our canvas unfurling,
 We'll weather the tide;
 With pennants streaming,
 Like serpents gleaming,
 We'll boldly ride.
 Tho' tempests be rocking,
 'Tis jovial mocking
 To man's daring mood;
 But rapturous jesting
 To us is the breasting
 Of storm and of flood.

The orchestral accompaniment is given a form expressive of the buoyant feelings of the voyagers, and the murmuring of the sea as it ripples under a sportive breeze. The seamen look hopefully westward, and are already filled with the fresher, stronger spirit of that new world in whose quest they are setting sail.

A short orchestral prelude leads up to the second chorus. In this a far different mood possesses the minds of the crew; their courage gives place to impatience, their hopeful enthusiasm departs, while the sea seems to rush and roar in the long-drawn tones of the horns and the monotonous movement of the quartette, expressive of a growing hopelessness:—

For many days and many nights
Onward we have sailed,
With vigour fresh and courage bright
A lofty goal pursuing.
We trembled not 'mid storms sublime,
Nor anxious felt 'mid calm most dismal;
Yet the ocean's endless swell
Upon our vessel's keel would break,
And no friendly starry sign
The lonesome, gloomy night illumed.
Our courage sinks, our hope's lamed,
And troubled scruples leave us never;
When will the day be dawning
That ev'ry ardent dream fulfils?

Now Columbus moves among the seamen and seeks to revive their sinking spirits, holding before them the great aim they seek. The aria in which he thus appeals to them is perhaps one of the finest in the whole work. In broad, strong accents it portrays the great leader's unfaltering courage and self-confidence, through which, as a vision, he sees not only the new world rising out of the water before them, but also the grand future of the continent he discovers:—

Oh, fear not now! Have faith in me, your leader,
The blessed day is drawing near,
When we shall reach the hallowed harbour,
And view the longed-for unknown land.

In spirit there before me lying,
 I see its wonders without end;
 Through vistas long of distant ages,
 My wond'ring gaze doth rove.
 I see the mighty surging masses
 Of people seeking the untried shore;
 A weary combat, bloody struggles,
 Then high a noble banner waves;
 A mighty banner, peace defender,
 Hoard of freedom and of light.
 Press forward, comrades, boldly steer!
 We'll hasten on our grand career,
 So long ago forshadowed;
 Whate'er the hindring power unfurled,
 We'll soon behold a new, fair world,
 Emerging from the billows.

The dramatic action is now taken up by the captain of the vessel (a tenor). Days and weeks have passed, but the eyes of the sailors have vainly gazed to westward. Suddenly land appears, with wonderful castles, groves of palm, and beautiful women. But, alas! it is only a lying mirage, a fata morgana of the sea, which the tempest soon dispels.

Once more the days and nights have vanished,
 No token courage new doth rouse,
 The sought-for goal proclaiming.
 Yet lo! what wondrous blaze of glory
 The horizon displays!
 Is this the goal, the land we've yearned for?
 Ah, no, 'tis but a fond illusion,
 The ocean's tremulous mirage,
 The work of Fay Morgana.
 It holds my ev'ry sense imprisoned,
 It lures me on, as dreams have lured
 Islands fair, like gems beaming,
 Adorn the trackless blue,
 Transfigured heroes seeming
 To my enraptured view.

The billows all resplendent,
 With marble arches glow,
 They mirror groves transcendent,
 Where gloomy palm-trees blow,
 And women with beauty dowered,
 Than sleeper's dream more fair,
 'Neath flow'ry trees embowered,
 Soon quiet all our care,
 Now stately as Valkyries
 Are they; with one accord
 They now are kind and gracious
 And promise love's reward,
 And wide open doors they're flinging,
 Proud harps we hear and song;
 We enter, heroes, singing,
 A joyous, merry throng.

The dream hath flown, the magic long departed,
 The endless breakers ebb and flow;
 The waves they roll, the tempest threatens
 And darkly warns of Heaven's wrath.
 (To Columbus). O Sire, forbear,
 And cease this hopeless venture,
 Our home to us again restore!

And the agitated chorus joins in the lamentation:—

Restore! restore our country!
 The storms they rage, loud roar the waves,
 The billows fashion here a grave,
 Upheaving now and groaning.
 The eye no saving land doth spy,
 And all our cries for help soon die;
 The wind is loudly moaning.
 Restore! restore our native home!
 Come, veer about, and swiftly!
 We will no longer blindly roam,
 'Tis death and 'tis destruction.
 Restore! restore our country!

Again, with undaunted courage, Columbus seeks to inspire them:—

Oh, falter not! Show manhood's dauntless mood,
That ye so oft have trusted!
What tho' our ship may rock and creak,
What tho' the whirlpool yawn and gape,
There beams on us soon our vict'ry's highest summit.
A short while trust me, I implore;
'Tis in my mind's eye o'er and o'er,
We'll reach our goal, the Western shore,
Ere morning's bright Aurora.

New hope has been instilled, and the chorus repeats:—

We'll trust our guide for evermore;
'Tis in his mind's eye o'er and o'er,
We'll reach our goal, the Western shore,
Ere morning's bright Aurora.

And now follows an "Intermezzo" for semi-chorus and chorus. The captain of the vessel sings:—

The morning dawns, the weary night is past.
The far-off East now is heralding
The coming day at last.
Oh let us turn our gaze devoutly
To God, far over the starry vault,
And pray that aid and mercy lending
He'll soon our fears and doubts be ending.

The chorus joins him:—

Thy eye, O Lord, that never sleeps,
Beholds the lonely sailor's need,
Watch over earth and ocean keeps,
And knows the dangers we must heed.
Thou makest calm the troubled soul,
Thou dost inspire the manly mood.
And we shall surely find the goal
For Thee obeys the restless flood.

The sun rises and the captain sings:—

Oh see! What looms so high in yonder sheen
 What glows so high in sunshine airy!
 Is it a cloud, a forest green?
 Morgana, gentle fairy?
 Sporteth she ever in winsome play?
 Moveth our ship her magic way?
 No! No!
 'Tis no illusion
 It is no tremulous mirage—
 It is the land we've madly yearned for!

The chorus sings:—

It is the land we've madly yearned for,
 The land, the promised land!
 A welcome waiteth on the strand;
 Our doubt has now departed,
 A new fair world upstarted.
 Give thanks to God, whom we adore!
 We'll bless his name for evermore!

And now Columbus, whose courage and faith have won their reward,
 consecrates the land, and prophesies its glorious destiny:—

On thee, O virgin soil, with speed
 We plant our glorious standard;
 And strewing here the tender seed
 We'll open homes for manly deed,
 For effort pleasant pastures.
 The spirit's harvest here we'll reap,
 The noblest fruit discover;
 A vital flame shall upward leap,
 And here, where boldest combats sweep,
 The blessed light shall hover.

The crew, rejoicing and grateful, pay homage to their leader, and the chorus sings:—

Hail, Columbus! ha!!
 Hero, guide, all hail!
 Who thro' the ocean, without fail,
 A hardy path hath broken.
 Though ill we heeded his command,
 He gave to us the wonderland,
 Of which he long hath spoken.
 Hail, Columbus! hail!
 Hero, guide, all hail

And solo voices and chorus continue:—

Here on this free and hallowed shore
 Shall flourish sweetest song,
 And freely hearts and lips shall pour
 Forth purest strains of song.
 While anthems full of sacred glow,
 In splendour, like the sea,
 Shall equal thy wild torrent's flow
 In pride and majesty.

Now, with steady increase of volume, comes the final chorus, swelling with a grand outburst of joy:—

Where'er thy floating banner gleams,
 Tho' distant far the strand,
 That wealth of music forward streams,
 And calls to action grand,
 Then rushes forth, with echoes long,
 Proud freedom's solemn festal song.

Symphony in B Minor

SCHUBERT

Music kindly lent by Charles Levy, Esq.

Orchestra

Schubert's Unfinished Symphony in B Minor was composed in 1822. In this and the great C Major Symphony, Schubert seems to have struck out a real, independent symphony style for himself, thoroughly individual in every respect, both of idea, form and orchestration. The first movement of the B Minor is entirely unlike any other symphonic first movement that was ever composed before. It seems to come direct from the heart, and to have the personality of the Composer in it to a most unusual degree. The orchestral forces used, are the usual ones, but in the management of them there are numbers of effects which are perfectly new in this department of art, indicating the tendency of the time towards direct consideration of what is called "colour" in orchestral combinations, and its employment with the view of enhancing the degree of actual sensuous enjoyment of a refined kind, to some extent independent the subjects and figures.—C. MARCH along, march along, with weapons all glittering bright,
 March along, for freedom and country we fight.
 Raise our battle cry, loud and high, to the sky,
 March along, march along, our cause is the just and the right.

Life is short at best, 'tis an empty jest,
 Then join our jovial song as we thus march along.
 Soon shall we be at rest 'neath the earth's chilly breast,
 But while we march along let us be gay.

Soldiers live and die, widows mourn and cry,
 War is rough weather,
 Cowards quail and fly, but not you or I,
 Comrades happy and jolly together.
 Soldiers, close up the ranks.
 Fight for fatherland, freedom and glory,
 Let the battle be gory, living in story,
 Earning a nation's thanks, hurrah!

Fatherland, thy blessing is o'er us, goes before us,
 And for fatherland chant we our chorus,
 Safe in that glorious name.
 For our fatherland we yield up our being, all agreeing
 That for fatherland danger's worth seeing,
 For death can bring no shame.
 Let us onward go, lead us onward.

Gaily the trumpets call,
Forward, ye warriors all,
Soon will the foemen fall,
 Onward we're going.
Fear not yon iron hail,
Ne'er let your cheek grow pale,
Our arms shall yet prevail,
 Onward we go.

Then away, march away,
 For the day we shall gain,
Then away, march away,
 O'er the hill and the plain.
 March along, march along, &c.
